"Yours now, but theirs tomorrow by you don't—"
"How dare he, the low cur!"
"Quite so, but you must do nothing tonight. You mustn't even refer to it. You promised me."
"Aye, aye; I'll keep my word," said the captain. "We've done enough tonight."
He turned and stepped to the break of the poon.

We'll see about that. Four dozen the captain tonight. You mustn't even refer to it. You promised me."

"Aye, aye; I'll keep my word," said the captain. "We've done enough tonight."

He turned and stepped to the break of the poop.

"Men," he cried, "you have done well. I don't th'nk they'll trouble us tonight again, but we'll keep a sharp lookout, and if they do they'll find us ready for them, as we were before. Manuel!"

"Here, sir," returned the Spanish boy.

"Open the lazaretto and serve out a good tot of grog all around; let all hands splice the main-brace, and if any of you are hurt report on the quarterdeck at once and we'll see what can be done for you. Mr. Conant!"

"Aye, aye; sir."

"Will you take tally of the crew and report to me any casualties?"

"Yes, sir," answered the mate, and the next moment his deep voice could be heard mustering the men.

Two of the Amercans had been killed, three had been seriously wounded, and a number had received silght and inconsequent bruises. On the whole, they had come of years.

"You have driven them over!" he ried. "Your pistols?"
Without a word Susan handed them to him. He leaned over and fired point-blank into the huddled mass in the boat. A scattering volley hastly aimed and doing no damage was the answer, and a moment later the boat drifted away in the darkness.

"You have driven them over!" he mustered the crew. The arms of the men had been stowed in the chests, burlet had been stowed in the chests, burlet had been locked, and Mr. Conant had the keys in his pocket. The captain and the mate were both armed, as usual, with sword and pistols, so that, the darkness.

"Sacre bleu!" cried the sailor, "you have saved us all. It was well done You are a woman in a thousand."

They were alone of the quarterdeck. He slipped his arm around her waist, and before she knew what he was doing he kissed her full upon the lips. Susan, infuriated, wrenched herself free and drove at him with her sword. Francois, was too near for her to strike him. He caught her wrist with his arm. "Forgive me!" he said, "but I love you. I am a great man in n'y own land. For love of you I have come on this shia."

"You coward! You dog!" cried Susan, wrenching her hand away.

"Father!" she screamed loudly.

"Father!" she screamed loudly.

"Stop!" cried Francois, "If you tell him I will kill him. The crew are with me. Mark you."

"We have driven them away from the poop deck, captain," cried Francois, stepping forward quickly, "thanks to the courage of your daughter."

"Thank God!" cried Captain Hiram, "and we've repulsed them from the waist. Go forward, Francois; the ship is clear of the British dogs."

"Will they come back again?" asked

"Hold on, there," said the mate; "he's not ready yet."

Ale stepped over toward the boatswain, took his shirt between his two hands and tore it down from top to bottom, exposing his back.

"Now you can begin."

Susan walked aft, turning her back on the scene. She had seen men flogged before, always with horror, but never quite under circumstances like these.

The Greek raised the cat and struck the boatswain lightly over the bare shoulders.
